As an intern, is it necessary that I stick on to one company for two years? - Prakash Jha

Dear Prakash, I will not say that it is bad that you stick on a company for two years as an intern. But if you feel that things need to spice up a bit then it's up to you for sure. Today, workers change jobs on average every 4.2 years, and I have known people who do internship as a part-time job and then slowly as in when they find a better opportunity which suits them both professionally and personally they move to take up the offer and join full-time employment. While some companies have an internship clause where you are bound with the company for a specified time, some do not have that particular time frame and hence you are free to move as in when you feel it's time for you to spread your wings and make way for new opportunities ahead. If you love the company and the job you do, you can definitely try and talk to your manager and get a permanent employment in the same company this will help you save time and effort as well. Make sure you do things which make you noticeable in the eyes of your manager.

Change is fast in today's workplace - when skills change, companies change, jobs disappear. Oftentimes, career advancement opportunities are easier found outside your existing company just based on timing and opportunity. Internships are just stepping stones to the next stage of a career, but these days, that stone's throw from flunky to full-time is a much longer distance. Always strive to do your best, but remember that internships are designed to offer a learning experience. You're not going to know everything, and you're going to botch things a time or two.
