FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES TO FACE A DRASTIC DROP IN THE NUMBER OF ASIAN STUDENTS

UK universities have been told to expect a sharp fall in the number of new international students coming next year, including a loss of up to £460m in income from students from east Asia. The decline of 20% in students from east Asia would amount to a 12% fall in overall international student numbers, causing a £460m loss of income from tuition and living expenses such as accommodation. While the fall in student numbers appears smaller than some institutions are anticipating, A new survey of international students by the British Council has found that nearly 14,000 fewer students from eight countries – including China, Singapore and Malaysia – are likely to come to the UK in 2020/21 in the wake of the coronavirus pandemic.. Source: The Guardian

HARVARD UNIVERSITY MOVES TO ONLINE PLATFORM

One of the biggest universities across the world, The Harvard University is likely to at least begin its fall semester with remote learning. But when it comes to pricey Ivy League schools that are able to charge the equivalent of a three-bedroom ranch home in Indiana for a bachelor's degree. At Harvard University, for example, the total cost of attending Harvard last year without financial aid worked out to $46,340 for tuition and $67,580 for tuition, room, board, and fees combined. With that in mind, I think it's easy to imagine a world where students may not want to pay the Harvard sticker price to attend a prestigious university from their living room. After all, many experts say that part of the value of an Ivy League education is in the networking and who you meet and collaborate with while you're in school. With remote learning in place, this major benefit is off the table. Source: Forbes
